Chile's political, institutional and financial scenario is stable thanks to its openness to international markets, and with a high degree of efficiency and a high level of investment protection. The country's financial system, in particular with regards to banking, is developed and in line with international standards.

Thanks to the high number of commercial agreements (26 agreements in force with 64 markets, making up 86.3% of the total GDP), Chile can be considered as a 'platform' country from which all important Latin American countries can be reached.

Chile's economy is strongly oriented towards international markets, with considerable commercial. The country has finalized the highest number of trade facilitations at worldwide level (75% of export-import takes place using preferential rates). There is considerable openness towards international investments, with foreign investors having the same opportunities and obligations as domestic investors, with operations permitted in almost all sectors.

Chile is part of OMC, APEC, OMPI; it is an associated member of MERCOSUR and the Comunita Andina.

The country has agreements regarding the protection of investments with 20 European countries.

The reduction of prices for raw materials on international markets, including copper, of which Chile is the first manufacturer (with about 30% of the world's reserves), has had an important effect on the country's economy, which has not, however, damaged Chile's GDP, which has 2.1% annual growth.
